

CLIR Digitizing Hidden Collections Grant

Crabtree Document and Photograph Scanning Rubric

There are approximately 374 inches (or 9654 individual catalog entries) of documents and 1382 images or negatives in the Donald E. Crabtree Lithic Collection. After an initial analysis, we have organized materials into two preliminary digitization categories: 1) Scan for preservation only (starting on page 2), and 2) Scan for public distribution after additional vetting (starting on page 17). Despite widely varying content, the materials in these two categories can be broken into three distinct types based on the content of the publication or image: material unsuitable for the public, personal information/notes/images, and correspondence/professional papers and images/article drafts.

Scan for preservation only

Entire publications or portions of copyrighted materials in the collection are immediately disqualified from distribution. These include items such as advertisements, print copies of magazine/journal articles or entire issues, confidential archaeological documents, etc. Items that contain information of a personal, medical, financial, etc. nature are also disqualified. Although these items will not be distributed via the project site, they will be scanned for preservation purposes.

Scan for public distribution after additional vetting

After an initial analysis, if an item does not fall into the “scan for preservation only” category, it will undergo additional vetting to determine whether it can be made available on the project site. During this process, grant project staff will review items for any additional copyright concerns, such as the existence of co-authors on the rough drafts of publications. Resources such as the Library of Congress search tool will be consulted in these situations. A content-level analysis of items in this digitization category will also occur to confirm that they should be distributed via the project site. For example, although Crabtree’s personal correspondence with friends and colleagues is not under copyright, information of a sensitive nature might be included in these items. Where copyright determination may be difficult, staff will consult U of I Library personnel or seek advice from the U of I’s Office of Technology Transfer.

Included below is a general scanning and distribution plan based on the two preliminary digitization categories, organized by box number. The content of some boxes is split between digitization categories and select items are intermingled with notations that are useful to researchers or the public. Upon further review, some documents might be recategorized and removed from/added to the public distribution consideration list.
